Living by the rules

Why do we have so many laws and rules in society? We have to do what we're told at home, school, work and in the street. So where do our laws come from?

- 1 _____ had a civil code to control their citizens. People think it was recorded in 12 books. These rules were based on the idea of tradition, rhetoric (the ability to speak in public and persuade an audience) equality and justice. Later, Ur-nammu who ruled Sumer (which is in Iraq) created the first law code with both crimes and punishments, with laws based on conditional sentences 'If someone ..., then they will be...'. Then in 1760 BC, the law was written on stones that everyone could see. One of the stones was found in the 19th century by British archaeologists who translated the laws into modern languages.
- 2 _____ holy law, human decree (what people say should happen) and custom (what is usually done). The law was used to prevent conflict between Greek states (when Greece was made of different city states) and problems between citizens of the same state. They believed that having an external person to judge the cases meant that problems were solved more easily.
- 3 _____ At this time if a member of your family was killed, you killed a member of the murderer's family and this often started a blood feud and lots of people were killed. The law helped prevent this by using an external person to look at the facts and make a fair decision that everyone would accept.
- 4 _____ the first known written law of Ancient Greece in the seventh century B.C. He decided that the punishment for murder would be exile - when the murderer left the country forever. Law givers were important because they were not kings or politicians but normal people. This made them more impartial and ensured equality and fairness.
- 5 _____ religious tolerance and pluralism (the belief that many different people can live together) and were written in a text called 'Manusmriti' around 100 B.C. This influenced societies across south-east Asia but was replaced by common law during the British Empire.

In conclusion, in any modern, multicultural society, we need to make sure that everyone agrees what is right and wrong. If we didn't have laws, there would be many more social problems and society would not function. Rules and laws might be boring but they can make the difference between peace and chaos.
