What would you do? A real life dilemma

Edward Snowden was working for the US government as a computer specialist. Then, he found out that the government had information about people from all over the world from emails, telephone messages and websites. However, most people did not realize that the government had this. Edward decided that this was wrong and he left his job in May 2013. Afterwards, he shared some of this information with journalists. As a result, several newspapers in America, the UK and Germany reported what he had found out. People were surprised and angry that the US government had been getting and using this private information about ordinary people without them knowing.

In June, the American government said that Edward had stolen government property. Edward traveled to Russia so that he would not be arrested by the police. The Russian government then allowed him to stay in the country so that he wouldn't have to go back to America.

Edward is now a famous but controversial person. Some people say he is a traitor (someone who has acted against their country) who has made a bad decision and should go to prison. Others say he is a patriot and did the right thing for his country and the world because people have the right to know what their governments are doing. People like Edward are called "whistleblowers" and they need to be brave because their life can be very difficult after they tell the world what they know. Sometimes it is easier to tell a lie than the truth, but this is not always the right decision.

So, what do you think? Should Edward get away with telling the world about what he found out?
Or is he a criminal who ought to go to prison where he can think long and hard about what he has done?

1 Edward works …
   - a with computers.
   - b for governments.
   - c as a journalist.

2 He left his job because …
   - a he wanted to travel.
   - b he disagreed with what his employer had done.
   - c he wanted to leave the USA.

3 Who was the information about?
   - a American people
   - b government workers
   - c people all over the world

4 How did people react to what Edward told them?
   - a They were happy to hear the news.
   - b They already knew this.
   - c They were not happy.

5 What did the government do next?
   - a They asked Edward to return to work.
   - b They said he had done the wrong thing.
   - c They accused him of lying.

6 Where did Edward go?
   - a back home
   - b to Germany
   - c to Russia

7 What did the Russian government let him do?
   - a stay in the country
   - b leave the country
   - c travel to the UK

8 What is a "whistleblower"?
   - a someone who has to leave their job
   - b someone who works for the government
   - c someone who tells the truth about an organization or company

9 Why did he share this information with the world?
   - a He thought he should tell everyone what he had found out.
   - b He thought he would make money.
   - c He wanted to become famous.

10 What does the blogger think about Edward?
   - a He cheated.
   - b He was right to be open about what he found out.
   - c He got away with doing something bad.

11 Read part of an email you receive from an English-speaking friend.

I don't know what to do. I had an argument with my friend Sara yesterday and now she isn't speaking to me. I'm having a birthday party at the weekend and I've invited lots of my friends. However, I haven't invited a boy called Pete who my best friend likes. I don't really like him so I told her I wasn't going to invite him. Now she is angry with me. What do you think I should do? Should I invite him to make her happy? What will happen if I don't? Please write back and give me some advice.

Now write an email to your friend (100 – 120 words).
