Reading

9 Read the article. Match numbers 1–10 below with the extracts (A–E) in the article.

Avaaz – Sharing a Dream

A - Nowadays we turn on the TV or check the news online and what we hear and see can be horrendous, leaving you feeling overwhelmed – what can you do about it? Since the miracle of the internet, activists can tell people all over the world about what is happening where they live and you can help. How?

B - Avaaz (meaning 'voice' or 'song' in Persian) is an organisation that uses the internet to gain support for causes all over the world. Funded only by its members, it has a lot of freedom to express opinion and push for change. Since being set up in 2007, it has campaigned for a multitude of issues from climate change, human and animal rights, to government corruption. It has been recognised as "the globe's largest and most powerful online activist network."

C - The organisation stands out because of its use of audacious methods. For example, they took cardboard pigs to the World Health Organisation to ask for an investigation into swine flu. They also pulled off a 3-mile long human chain (of people holding hands) linking the Chinese Embassy with the Dalai Lama (who opposes the Chinese government) to encourage them to talk. These stunts ensure media coverage and get people talking.

D - Admittedly, they also have their critics. They have responded to the plight of Syrian people in the Civil War, sending in medical supplies and communications equipment. Subsequently, some NGOs suggested they were taking sides in the war. What's more, they undeniably campaigned against Donald Trump in the presidential elections, creating software to allow US citizens living abroad to vote against him.

E - Whether you agree with their causes or not, they are an inspiration and a force for change. Never before has one internet-based organisation accomplished so much, helping people who others cannot. By allowing people of different nationalities, religions and races to connect over the internet, they promote the idea of unity and empathy in an era of fear and division.
